An Assessing study of the nature of field training in social work program in the AL-Balqa Applied University from the students' view point the study aims at assessing the nature of field training in the social work program in the Applied Balqa University from the students’ view point to investigate the students directions towards the importance of the field training in the process of practical and employing readiness and investigate the difficulties which they face in the training from their view point so the study included all the students of the field training of the second semester 2010/2011 (130 male/female students of the social service in the Applied Balqa University) the result of the study shows that the students' directions are positive towards the importance of field training in term of career development and students' abilities and skills increasing to deal with people who benefit from the social service program and shows the difficulties that face the training students like the fewness of resources and books of field training and the coincidence of theoretical and field training courses in the same time and day. it is necessary to let the students choose the field of their training according to what they like to develop and improve the field training. the study shows that there are statistical differences of the importance of training due to gender variable and there are no statistical differences of the training difficulties due to the average level, gender and college.
